the same time, the fact that the same person can be both a subject and an object of a relation is not a contradiction. For example, a person can be both a subject and an object of a relation of self-love. In the same way, a person can be both a subject and an object of a relation of self-hatred. This is not a contradiction, because the relation of self-love and the relation of self-hatred are different relations.

It is also possible for a person to be both a subject and an object of a relation of self-love and self-hatred at the same time. For example, a person can love himself and hate himself at the same time. This is not a contradiction, because the relation of self-love and the relation of self-hatred are different relations.
